

Before launching in the song, "How It's Going To Be," Way also spoke passionately about how grateful he was to be making music.

"I didn't think I'd make it past 25, and that's a true story. I didn't think there was anything else for me. I didn't think I'd find love or have anyone care for me, but you just have to see what's on the other side. You just have to go and find it."

He also spoke highly about the importance of the trans community and the need to seek help for anyone suffering from depression, respectively. The sentiments left the audience in awe and applauding his words of wisdom and encouragement.

Way played every song on the album, as well as a bonus track titled "Television All The Time.," that was released as part of the Japanese edition.

As the night drew to a close, Way leaned into the microphone to say that he was "Looking forward to meeting everyone after the show"—a promise he had already made via Twitter. Fans swarmed the back of the venue crowding around a small door. Astonishingly, Way waited for the crowd of well over 100 people who eventually all made their way through to have something signed by the singer and to give him their personal thanks.

There is certainly no doubt that Gerard Way's passion for music still shines after all these years. Whether it be through his work with My Chemical Romance or his current solo efforts, the singer still puts every ounce of effort into his live performances and doesn't let the audience down. An admirable trait that will surely continue for years to come.